

A person is walking away from the camera on a sandy beach towards the ocean. The sky is a mix of light blue and orange, suggesting a sunset or sunrise. The person is wearing a hat and light-colored clothing. The text is overlaid on this background.

How to convince a company to hire you remotely

Even. Without. Experience.

@amit.goes.remote

1. Stop selling yourself. Start solving one problem

Companies do not hire “experience”. They hire relief.

Instead of saying:

“I am looking for a remote role and I am a beginner”

Do this:

- Study the company for 30 to 60 minutes
- Identify one visible gap or inefficiency
- Message them with a suggestion, not a CV

Example:

“I noticed your blog is strong but not repurposed for LinkedIn. I mapped a simple 7-post content flow you could test this month.”

This positions you as useful, not needy.

2. Build proof without a job

You do not need experience. You need evidence.

Organic proof ideas:

- Redesign one page of their website and share a Loom walkthrough
- Audit their LinkedIn or Instagram and suggest 3 improvements
- Create a mock dashboard, content calendar, SOP, or report
- Volunteer for a non-profit, creator, or open-source project for 2 weeks

Remember, one real example beats five certificates.

3. Use the “trial ask”, not the job ask

Asking for a job is high friction.
Asking for a short trial is low risk.

Message like this:

“I am not asking for a role upfront. Would you be open to a 7-day paid trial to test fit and output?”

Remote companies love trials because:

- Time zones matter less
- Output matters more than degrees
- Risk is controlled

Many full-time remote roles start this way.

4. Show you already work remotely

Remote hiring is about trust, not talent.

Signal remote readiness organically:

- Communicate clearly and concisely
- Share async updates without being asked
- Use tools they already use
- Respect time zones in your messaging

Even small things like clean Notion docs or clear Loom videos make a huge difference.

5. Be visible where they already hang out

Do not cold email randomly.

Better organic channels:

- Comment thoughtfully on founders' LinkedIn posts
- Answer questions in Slack, Discord, or community groups
- Share breakdown posts of how companies can improve something
- Post “build in public” updates about what you are learning

Familiar names convert faster than cold strangers.

6. Reframe “no experience” as “low baggage”

This sounds counterintuitive, but it works.

You can honestly say:

“I may not come with legacy habits. I learn fast, document everything, and adapt to your systems.”

Many startups prefer this over people who say:

“At my previous company we did it like this...”

7. Ask for feedback, not opportunities

This is one of the most underrated organic moves.

Message:

“I admire how your team does X. If you had 2 minutes, what skill would you expect someone to have before joining you remotely?”

People reply to this.
And often, they remember you.

@amit.goes.remote

8. Consistency beats confidence

Unfortunately, most people quit after:

- 3 ignored messages
- 1 rejection
- 1 awkward call

Remote hiring rewards the person who shows up again with better clarity, better proof, and better communication.

@amit.goes.remote

Follow amit.goes.remote
for more such content on travel + remote work

